This dissertation is a study of congressional foreign policy hearings in two relevant foreign policy committees in the Senate: Foreign Relations and Armed Services. It focuses on the hearings held between 2007 and 2012, examining the topics discussed and the participants involved.

The research aims to understand the role of these hearings in shaping U.S. foreign policy. By analyzing the transcripts and discussing the impact of these hearings on policy decisions, the dissertation contributes to the understanding of the dynamics within Congress and the policy-making process.

Key findings include the frequency of hearings on various topics, the influence of external events on the agenda, and the role of congressional committees in shaping the foreign policy landscape. The dissertation also explores the impact of these hearings on international relationships and the outcomes of U.S. foreign policy engagements.

The conclusions drawn from this research support the importance of congressional hearings as a platform for discussing foreign policy issues and their potential to influence policy decisions. The dissertation provides insights into the workings of the U.S. Congress and the factors that shape its role in the international arena.
